PART TWO: ACTION TAKEN BY THE CONFERENCE OF THE PARTIES AT ITS FIRST SESSION*/

- I. DECISIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONFERENCE OF THE PARTIES
- II. RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONFERENCE OF THE PARTIES

*/ Part Two of this report is contained in document ICCD/COP(1)/11/Add.1

I. OPENING OF THE CONFERENCE

A. Opening of the session (agenda item 4)

1. The first session of the Conference of the Parties (COP1), convened pursuant to article 22 of the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification (CCD), was opened at the headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) in Rome, on 30 September 1997 by Mr. Hama Arba Diallo, Executive Secretary, in his capacity as head of the interim secretariat. Welcoming all participants to the Conference, he thanked the Government and people of Italy, and the authorities and citizens of Rome, for their generosity in hosting the Conference as well as FAO for having made it possible to hold the first session of the Conference of the Parties at its headquarters.

B. Election of the President (agenda item 1)

2. At its 1st meeting on 30 September, the Conference elected H.E. Mr. Lamberto Dini, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Italy, as President by acclamation.

3. At the same meeting, the President made a welcoming statement. He welcomed participants to Rome, and stressed that Italy attributed great importance to dialogue, compromise, mutual understanding and global solidarity, issues which were essential to foster development and to protect the environment. The CCD was an instrument not only to deal with a problem affecting the physical integrity of the planet, but also the well being and peaceful socio-economic development of humanity. Desertification causes impoverishment of people. The problem was not merely technical but political, including economic concerns, and social sensitivity. Desertification was a common problem, and the responsibility of the entire international community. The CCD represents the best efforts to effectively redesign a North-South partnership. The COP1 agenda essentially defines the implementation of the instruments of the Convention. Although a fairly clear picture was emerging, some sensitive issues still needed to be debated, including the Global Mechanism, the programme of work, and the Secretariat's budget. He highlighted the importance of the Committee on Science and Technology (CST) in implementing the CCD.

C. Opening and general statements (agenda item 4)

4. At its 1st plenary meeting on 30 September, a message from the Secretary-General of the United Nations was conveyed to the Conference by Mr. Nitin Desai, Under-Secretary-General for the Department of Economic and Social Affairs; and opening statements were made by Ambassador Bo Kjellén, Chairman of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for the Elaboration of an International Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, Particularly in Africa (INCD); Mr. Jacques Diouf, Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO); Professor G.O.P. 9. At its 3rd plenary meeting on 2 October, the President read out the following statement:

“The Conference of the Parties noted that the Eastern European Group currently had only one Party to the Convention and it therefore decided that it would be appropriate not to leave the second Bureau seat, to which that regional group was entitled, empty at the present session, but rather to fill it.

This COP decision was made on the understanding that the action was exceptional and that the seat would revert to the Eastern European Group at the second session of the COP.

This decision of the COP does not in any way prejudice the interest of any Group in future meetings of the COP.”

10. The Conference then elected by acclamation the following officers to serve on its Bureau:

35. At the 11th plenary meeting of the COP1 on 9 October, the President opened the Plenary item "Dialogue on Building Partnerships for the Convention to Combat Desertification". The Chairman explained that this item was prepared by the non-governmental (NGO) community. The intention was to undertake an open discussion with delegates and interact on a less formal basis with them. He said the item was innovative and fully expressed the spirit of the Convention in its bottom-up approach. The plenary was then suspended and replaced by an informal session where participants broke into small groups to discuss the meaning of partnerships. A national case study on building partnerships for national action programmes was presented jointly by a government and several NGOs. Thereafter open discussion took place.

36. The resulting dialogue recognized that all sectors of society must be mobilized if combatting desertification was to be successful. The segment was effective in stressing the importance of open dialogue amongst all stakeholders, especially the NGOs and the local community; the need for mutual respect and awareness of the legitimate role of all stakeholders; the need to define the responsibilities and roles of all partners involved; and the political will on the part of implementing agencies to establish partnerships at every stage of the process of the national action programme.

"I noted statements made by some countries of Central and Eastern Europe concerning their wish to establish an additional regional instrument to the present Convention that would cover the specific concerns of these countries as well as the special commitments they are prepared to undertake within the framework of the Convention.

I understand those statements as an indication of the firm resolve of those countries to become soon Parties to the Convention by completing the process of the needed accession.

In this context consultations should be undertaken at an appropriate time and under the guidance of the Bureau of the COP in order to launch this process. These consultations will be facilitated by an early completion of the needed process of accession to the Convention."

ANNEX I

Summaries of opening statements

1. At its 1st plenary meeting on 30 September 1997, a message from the Secretary-General of the United Nations was conveyed to the Conference by Mr. Nitin Desai, Under-Secretary-General for Economic and Social Affairs. The CCD addressed a major global problem which should be an urgent priority area for the United Nations system. The 19th Special Session of the General Assembly in June this year had hailed the CCD's adoption and entry into force as one of the major accomplishments of the Rio process. COP1 was therefore a milestone on the path towards sustainable development. He stressed: the CCD's emphasis on poverty as a major cause of land degradation; its bottom-up approach; the priority given to Africa; and the need to integrate economic, environmental and social concerns. Delegates would need to ensure that the Secretariat will have the necessary resources to meet countries' requirements and expectations. The decision on administrative arrangements for the Global Mechanism was of particular importance. More than one billion people seriously affected by desertification were in urgent need of decisive action.
2. Ambassador Bo Kjellén, Chairman of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee (INCD), recalled the Convention's process, emphasizing that although the Convention grew out of the Rio process, its roots stretched further to the African droughts in the 1970s when the world's attention was directed to the problem of desertification. Guidance and leadership from African countries played a crucial role in the process. Although a lot had been done, work had only started now, and it must be ensured that the Convention will obtain its role as one of the main results from the Rio process. The first session of the CST underlined the importance of science and technology, and will establish an important basis for the exchange of experience and networking. A decision on the Global Mechanism was needed so that it could be operational by the second session of the Conference of the Parties (COP2). The discussion on the programme of work and the budget must be based on a shared conviction that a well functioning, efficient secretariat is indispensable. He stressed the innovative character of the Convention, and the global character of the problem of land degradation in the drylands. Although already more than hundred countries have ratified the Convention, he expressed hope that Australia, Japan and the United States would be Parties at COP2. This was a Convention to combat poverty and to create decent living conditions for millions of people. Results of the work must have an impact for the people in the drylands.
3. Mr. Jacques Diouf, Director General of the Food and Agricultural Organization (FAO), welcomed participants at the FAO headquarters. He stressed the link between FAO's main objective of food security and that of sustainable development which required strong action in combatting desertification. The major challenge of the next century would be to reduce the number of malnourished people who lack adequate access to food. The poorest populations of the world, and those most affected by food insecurity, were situated in arid and semi-arid areas, in the most fragile ecosystems with limited natural resources. It was urgent to act before tragic and irreversible events would occur. FAO had been involved in the fight against desertification from the beginning, and participated in the work of the INCD and the Secretariat. He described some CCD relevant programmes that have been established by the FAO, such as a programme with UNEP which provides specific support to countries of Latin America. In its member states, FAO had emphasized popular participation and the involvement of women in implementing sustainable development.
4. Professor G.O.P. Obasi, Secretary-General of the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) stressed that the WMO would continue to provide strong scientific and technical support to the negotiating process and to the implementation of the CCD. The WMO would: ensure the availability of meteorological, climatological and hydrological data; promote the assessment and management of freshwater resources in affected areas; collaborate with other organizations with climate-related programmes; promote research on the linkage between desertification and climate; contribute to the development of indicators and benchmarks relevant to the Convention; support the assessment of possible impacts of global climate change on desertification; and provide support to national Meteorological and Hydrological Services (NMHSs) and regional institutions. Financial resources and serious support for the CCD were crucial, and there was a need to base the CCD on sound scientific and technological knowledge rather than on politics alone. The CST should take into account activities related to Chapter 12 of Agenda 21, to establish an effective liaison with the International Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), and to make full use of the experience of the WMO.

5. Mr. Fawzi H. Al-Sultan, President of the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), described the CCD as the first international treaty that recognized the linkages between rural poverty and environmental degradation and which found fresh and imaginative ways of breaking the vicious circle. The principles that inspired the provisions of the CCD were very close to those that guided IFAD's own activities in the drylands. Major challenges which needed to be faced, were: to ensure that the National Action Programmes (NAPs) respond to the needs of local communities and to support an enabling environment for local area development; to create a supportive policy and institutional environment and disseminate appropriate technologies; to collaborate with development partners in support of the CCD's goals, and to finance the operations under the CCD. IFAD offered to host the Global Mechanism, which needed strong coalition of institutions concerned, but to ensure accountability it should be housed in one organization.

6. Mr. Anders Wijkman, Assistant Administrator, on behalf of the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), highlighted the relationship between poverty, drought and land degradation. UNDP had embraced the CCD as an excellent framework for addressing poverty and environmental degradation. It was important to strengthen human resources development, to create systems of good governance and legislative reforms giving priority to dryland issues, and to support participation and ownership by local communities. A UNDP study showed that drylands were inhabited by 2 billion people, rather than 900 million as formally assumed, of which 85 percent were from developing countries. The United Nations Office to Combat Desertification and Drought (UNSO) played an important role through which UNDP provided support to affected countries, particularly in Africa, and strengthened the implementation of the CCD. UNDP offered to host the Global Mechanism and supported a collaborative hosting arrangement to fully draw upon the complementary strengths of the concerned agencies. Yet, one agency should be selected for day-to-day management and accountability. The roles of the other collaborating institutions should be clearly defined to enable them to assume active roles.

7. Mr. Franklin Cardy, UNEP Director of Land, on behalf of the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), highlighted that the link between desertification and poverty was direct and intimate. The establishment of coordinating groups at the national level where different government ministries, donors and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) could elaborate the NAP were important. Cooperative arrangements were key to the successful implementation of the CCD. Parties now had a framework for action, and should show that they seriously care and recognize the importance of the issue. UNEP would continue to support implementation efforts at regional and global level, work to achieve improved assessment and science, support the CST, develop projects for the Global Environment Facility (GEF) and work to raise awareness of desertification issue worldwide. The availability of adequate financing, combined with total commitment, at the political level and at all levels of government and society were essential to combat desertification.

8. Ambassador Hama Arba Diallo, Executive Secretary of the CCD Secretariat, expressed his satisfaction that COP1 had received considerable attention, and thanked Italy and FAO for hosting the Conference. He reviewed the INCD process, emphasizing the remarkably fast advancement of the CCD process, and stressing the important role Ambassador Bo Kjellén has played. The ratification of the Convention by 112 countries was an extraordinary manifestation of political will. He stressed the priority of Africa, but highlighted the global character of the Convention. Cooperation between developing and developed countries, as well as international organizations and NGOs would be crucial. The common responsibility was to follow-up this Convention, and everyone had a moral duty to combat desertification with one's own means and possibilities. The recent fires in Southeast Asia and the El Niño effects were evidence of the need to act. COP1 was a determining moment for the future of the Convention. Those who look to Rome expect the international community to set clear signs of commitment and support for the millions of individuals who suffer. The principal objective was to assist the inhabitants of arid zones to use this Convention to combat poverty, to achieve food self-sufficiency and to escape the daily fight of survival.

9. At its 2nd plenary meeting on 30 September, Mr. Calestous Juma, Executive Secretary of the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD), described COP1 as an important step to lay the basis for furthering cooperation and synergy among the Rio conventions. He emphasized institutional cooperation between these conventions. Institutional cooperation heralded a new era in the links between international legal instruments and international technical instruments, particularly in bringing their expertise and experience to bear on the implementation of sustainable development programmes at the national and local levels. Of particular interest would be cooperation between the Subsidiary Body on Scientific, Technical and Technological Advice (SBSTTA) under the CBD and the CST under the CCD.

10. At its 5th plenary meeting on 3 October, Mr. Michael Zammit Cutajar, Executive Secretary of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) made a statement. He expressed his delight that the CCD and FCCC Secretariats would become neighbours again. Both, as well as their sister Convention CBD, were joined by the interaction amongst ecological problems that they address, and by their commitment to sustainable development. The international community had two opportunities to show its commitment to environmental precaution: one was at Rome's COP1, to decide on action to offer millions of people the hope of life in relative security, and the second was in Kyoto, at UNFCCC's COP3 in December 1997, to show that they were seriously committed to reduce global emissions of greenhouse gases. The interlinkage of the two environmental problems was significant, and success in Kyoto would make an important contribution to the fight against desertification. The two secretariats should explore opportunities for cooperation, particularly in capacity building, and streamlining processes for gathering and considering information. A pilot project had started, involving some developing countries to produce national reports that meet the requirements of the three sister conventions. There was also potential of reducing cost of administration, conference services and information technology for the two secretariats in Bonn.
